Further indications regarding the choice of a name

The information given on pages 1 to 3 is needed for processing the following tasks: Entry in the register of births, issuance of certificates, notifications to domestic and foreign authorities due to intergovernmental agreements.

The following documents are needed for notarizing births:

(Originals of all certificates and documents must be submitted, foreign certificates always with German translation if the certificate does not include German)

- Both identification cards or passports of the child's mother and the child's father (if appropriate, with residence permit)
- If the child's mother is unmarried: Birth certificate (except if the birthplace was Mainz)
- If the child's mother is divorced or widowed: If the marriage took place in Germany, current copy from the marriage register (including entry of the divorce or death of the spouse and a possible name change after dissolution of the marriage). If the marriage took place abroad, marriage certificate and divorce decree or death certificate of the spouse with German translation or issued on international printed form.
- If the child's father is unmarried: Birth certificate (unless the birthplace was Mainz)
- If the child's father is married, divorced or widowed: See "child's mother" (if the father's surname has changed)
- Certificate of the acknowledgement of paternity and if appropriate, certificate of joint custody
- (Information about the significance and notarization of the acknowledgement of paternity and custody is given by the youth welfare office competent for the mother's residence)*
- Additional certificates and documents according to the personal relationship of the parents will possibly be needed for the notarization. The registry office provides the respective information for you.

The child's name

The right to give the child a name is a joint parental right. Designations that according to their nature are not names may not be chosen. Two names can be combined to one single name. The usual short form of a name is also allowed as an independent name. Only male names are allowed for boys and only female names for girls. If a name puts the child's gender in doubt, we recommend to add another one to rule out any doubt. In cases of doubt, the registry office will be glad to provide information.

Unmarried parents giving their child a surname

1. German law

If the mother has sole custody, the child receives the surname that the mother used when the birth was notarized, except if the mother gives the child the father's name at the registry office. If the parents have joint custody, they decide which parental surname, either the father's or the mother's used at the time when the declaration was made, the child will carry at birth. This requirement also applies automatically to all other children when there is joint custody.

2. Foreign law

The child's name is basically subject to the law of the country he/she belongs to. If the parents are from different countries or one of them has multiple citizenships, then the right of each of these countries can also be selected. If one of the parents habitually resides in Germany, then German law can also be selected. Therefore, the name given to a child is determined according to the stipulations of the selected law.

Like the chosen name, the parents must also submit the declaration about the law selected before the child's birth is notarized. The registrar notarizing the child's birth is responsible for accepting declarations regarding the determination of a child's name.

The home country whose citizenship the child has acquired with his/her birth does not always recognize the name chosen by the parents or a determination of the surname according to German law. The designation of a name that does not correspond to the home country law should be coordinated with the competent home country authority or the consular representation of the home country.

Acquisition of German citizenship for the child

The child of foreign parents acquires German citizenship if one parent has a right of permanent residence and has been legally and habitually residing in Germany for eight or more years when the child was born. Moreover, there are special regulations with Switzerland. The registrar must regularly obtain the respective information from the competent immigration authority located where the parents are domiciled. This can delay the notarization of the child's birth.
